To improve the quality of telephone care, a quality control program was established at the Department of Surgery, Helios hospital in Mantes, France. This program, known as "telephone surgery", was introduced in 2001 for 9 specific procedures (including inguinal hernia, cholecystectomy and others). Its objective was to improve the quality of telephone service and reduce surgery delays by identifying and correcting possible obstacles during telephone consultations. A retrospective analysis of this quality control program was done based on the review of the medical reports and telephone consultations between January and December 2006. Each telephone consultation was reviewed independently by two operators, one of whom was trained, with the approval of the surgeon in charge. In 2006, 342 telephone consultations were carried out (70% to surgeons, 15% to medical staff and 15% to both). A total of 102 surgical procedures, which were performed during this period, were analyzed. The indication for surgery was an inguinal hernia in 44 cases and 47% of the surgical procedures were delay surgery (greater than 8 hours). The intervention report and medical report were completed for 97% of the patients, while the technical quality of the intervention was excellent for 85% of these reports. Surprisingly, the operators observed an insufficient quality of certain elements of the consultation, such as the technique of the surgical operation (10%), the written communication (12%), the absence of consultation during the day (45%), or the use of a domestic phone line (4%). The quality control program for telephone surgery has shown that the quality of this service has been improved in the surgical departments of Mantes, even though it is relatively new.Workplace violence against nurses is no longer an unsolved problem. Picture: Getty Most men think being well endowed won't hurt their self-esteem, but losing an erection at the crucial moment is upsetting, a new study has found. Most men have a typical penis size, and this size varies for each man. Too big, however, or too small, can cause some men to feel inadequate and embarrassed. 'More often than not, when we are talking about male sexual satisfaction, we are talking about men being satisfied with their penis size,' study author Dr Laura Carstensen said. She said the body image pressures men felt about having a large penis extended well beyond just whether they're happy with their size. 'Having a smaller penis is sometimes perceived as being deficient, whereas if it's larger it's perceived to be excessive,' she said. 'You can't say these feelings are absolute because self-esteem is relative and you can change your perception of yourself.' In the study carried out in New Zealand, the researchers asked almost 500 men about their penis size. All of the men had a partner, and all the men said they had and were happy to have sex with their partners. But 27 per cent of the men said they'd consider themselves to be sexually attractive, and 19 per cent said they were very sexually attractive. Almost one in five men said they'd consider their penis size as big, extra big or huge. 'If women are saying that it's awesome, the men, in a similar way, seem to know they are, in fact, not,' Dr Carstensen said. 'If they are not, it's a little bit of a problem.' The researchers said while the body image feelings were universal,
