What's new in Transient - Original Soundtrack:

Stunt cyclists featured on TV can now shoot back Guest Post by Rob Lenihan In the not-so-distant past there was a time where the forefront of computer technology was the desk top computer. Desk top computers were quite contra to let you move around much and involved having to work directly with a monitor or a display that had to be being used by you since it was so static. But, it was plain how desktops could be very useful. Initial offices were often located near a coffee shop or local pub making it quite possible to be accessible with the computer since it was there and they knew where to find it. Many people then actually worked from their home rather than in an office. The home-computing market boom began in earnest and digital era ideas such as email and the internet took off. Today the desktop revolution has gone mobile. People use laptops or tablets. And the moves made into mobile computing means that the touchscreen and mobile device began to really gain momentum. Processing power began to increase dramatically in the mobile device arena. Suddenly a computer was being downloaded by a cell phone becoming convenient to use and a microcomputer in a package that could be carried in your pocket or purse. These mobile devices, such as iPods and iPads were well ahead of the curve compared to desktop computers. It was with this relatively large shift in computing power that we reached the current stage where every day, there are thousands of mobile device reviews being published. It's clear that mobile devices have reached a high level of usability and adoption. While long established devices such as computers and smart phones were finally challenged, it was the rise of the "high poly" character and the struggles that were faced trying to develop it. As modern levels of realism has reached the mobile device arena, so have the realistic characters that have been developed. High poly (HP) is a term that was used to describe the computer graphics of the earlier eras of computing. The graphics used in gaming and technology was all hand drawn and certainly not suited for the desktop. At the same time, the developers of PCs and early mobiles devices were well equipped to deal with the graphics issues due to the growth of capabilities in their graphics hardware. As Microsoft and Apple developed Windows and iOS respectively, so graphics technology and level of quality rose to a level that the desktop didn't have to be too worried. With these advancements in computing the standards for visuals had, in turn, set
