I have also used generics like so: class Translator { private int someValue; Translator(int someValue) { this.someValue = someValue; } public void myMethod() { doSomething(); doSomethingElse(); } } class Translator implements XmlHandler { @Override public void handle(XmlHttpResponse xml) { String s = xml.getString(); // Do something... } } I'm wondering though, is this a valid use of generics? Will this perform any better than non-generics? Or will the "parsing overhead" of a generic handler (even though it doesn't do anything) outweigh any potential performance improvement? Is there some better way of using this pattern than what I'm currently doing? A: Whether it will perform better or not is dependent on the nature of your business logic. There is no reliable performance test. "More elegant" may be subjective. This is not a generic pattern that's commonplace in Java (though other languages may benefit from such a pattern). You should make it clear that it's not generic, i.e. the client should not assume that you'll only ever use Translator for a type T. It's also good to document that an instance of T is not wrapped in another class and that the
