Version 19 offers enhanced performance for.Volume-controlled ventilatory support by using a time-based servo-ventilator. Volume-controlled ventilation (VCV) is commonly used in medical and surgical intensive care units (ICUs). However, the amount of the inspiratory support is usually prescribed as a fixed ratio to the volume delivered over time. VCV was performed using a time-based servo-ventilator (TBV) that permits to the user to adjust the inspiratory support, without any interaction with the device. To evaluate the effect of VCV applied to the TBV in patients admitted to the medical ICU of a university hospital. A prospective, open study. A 12-bed medical ICU. 9 patients with prolonged mechanical ventilation (> 7 days) were studied. Each respiratory cycle (20 s) was divided into three phases: the initial tracheal occlusion (T1) and the subsequent breath (T2) in the TBV, and a subsequent measurement of the respiratory parameters. VCV was applied to the TBV using the same inspiratory pressure, positive end-expiratory pressure (PEEP) and fraction of inspired oxygen (F(I)O(2)), throughout the study. There was a significant reduction in the fraction of time in T2 and in the peak inspiratory flow when compared with the spontaneous breathing. Peak and mean inspiratory pressures were significantly lower during T1, with a significant increase in the subdiaphragmatic esophageal pressure during T2. There was a positive correlation between respiratory rate and PEEP applied to the TBV (r = 0.8). VCV applied to the TBV induces effective control of the inspiratory work. The use of PEEP, even with lower values than the preset, may reduce respiratory complications.If you’re planning a trip to New Jersey this year, be sure to make time for a trip to the Jersey Shore.
